Opportunity for laboratory practice has however been offered to all who wished it, after the regular school hours; and this opportunity has been sought by a number of those who showed the deepest interest in the study, and the greatest aptitude for it. In both Physics and Chemistry, much attention is paid to their mathematical applications, and problems of some difficulty are freely given, as well as those simpler ones which are common in most text-books, especially of Physics. GEOLOGY. Geology is taught partly by recitations from a text-book, partly by sub-lecture, on which the pupils take notes, and are held responsible for a knowledge of whatever additional matter they may contain. Much attention is given to leading the pupils to draw for themselves the inferences which geologists consider warranted by certain states of fact, --as to the climate of the...
