Createspace Independent Publishing Platform, United States, 2015. Paperback. Book Condition: New. 229 x 152 mm. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand .In the fifty letters exchanged between Henry David Thoreau and Harrison Gray Otis Blake, we come to understand these two neighbors were best of friends: kindred spirits with a love and appreciation for nature, and hiking companions who ask big questions on most any topic of the day including politics, slavery, love, friendship, art, religion, and mortality. During this time Thoreau lived in Concord, Massachusetts and Blake lived in Worcester with a mere 30 miles between them. The poems in this little book are literally cut from their correspondence, from March of 1848 to May of 1861. I stay close to the original text of the letters, only changing a verb tense or adding a preposition or article here and there. The poems are in the same chronological order as the letters were written. I don't cut a poem from every letter and from some letters I cut more than one poem. The first poem is from the first letter written by Blake in March 1848 and the last poem is from the last letter Thoreau wrote on May 3, 1861, almost exactly a year before his death from tuberculosis on May 2, 1862. Like any good student, or as Thoreau scholar Bradley P. Dean describes him, disciple, Blake kept all of Thoreau's letters, while Henry, being practical, pragmatic and a minimalist, kept only one. (We can imagine Thoreau recycling Blake's letters as kindling for a fire or a liner for a bird cage in the family home's attic). But the one letter Thoreau did keep from Blake was special. This was Blake's first letter to Thoreau and provides the...
